SOP took place in June in Hanover

Tradesmen and installation fitters often have to travel long journeys to get to their constantly changing work places, so that they spend lots of time in minibuses and commercial vehicles. Ergonomic concepts are particularly important for these hardworking people. Unfortunately there is still not enough construction site working equipment that takes account of such concepts. VW has recognised the problem, and has now started production of its first commercial vehicle with AGR-certified seats.

Commercial vehicle seats are often unergonomic and don't offer enough legroom, because space is needed for the loading area. VW has recognised the problem, and offers AGR-certified seats in its new Amarok commercial vehicle. The vehicle interior offers plenty of head clearance and legroom for driver and passengers, thanks above all to the height-adjustable front seats with large longitudinal adjustment. The electrically adjusted ergoComfort seats stand out with the sporty design of the lateral supports that have been optimised in terms of comfort and ergonomics. The optional electric driver's and passenger seats with 14-way function can be adjusted individually to the personal body size. At the touch of a button, the seats can be adjusted in length and height as well as the degree and width of lordosis support, while the backrest and seat cushion tilt is also adjusted by pressing a button. The depth of the seat is adjusted manually.

The new Amarok is produced in Hanover and has been available from dealerships since September. With immediate effect, the premium pick-up truck is powered by the latest generation of V6 turbo diesel engines. The vehicle is robust and reliable and operates with high tractive power at low revs.
